Tip of the Month:

Next of Kin Password Feature

One of our favorite password managers, LastPass, gives you the ability to grant one-time access to your Vault (including all of your passwords, Secure Notes, Form Fill data, and other information) to a designated person, via an access delay. This means when a designated person attempts to access your Vault, this person would have to wait a specified time period of your choosing (e.g., 2 hours) during which you are notified and have the ability to decline the requested access. If you do not deny the request within the specified time period, the Emergency Access user will be able to access your Vault. This is especially important for spouses to gain access to critical information in emergencies.
